Defensive Runs

Baseball is all about runs. Runs determine the score. Runs are all over the statistics. How many runs did he drive in? What's his earned run average? In the first volume of The Fielding Bible we developed metrics that help us better understand defense in baseball. We speculated that we would try to translate the new defensive metrics into runs. That's what we've done here in Volume II. We've taken all the metrics we had and converted them to runs.

24 States Analysis (or The Run Matrix)

Take your pick. What do you want to call it? On Bill James Online (BillJamesOnline.com), it's called "24 States Analysis". I'm a big fan of The Matrix movie series so I'll go with "The Run Matrix". It sounds like a complicated concept, but in reality it's not that difficult. It's simply a chart that tells you how many runs score in an inning following each of the possible 24 situations in an inning (or as we call them "states"). The 24 states are determined by how many men are out (zero, one or two) and how many men are on which bases. There are eight combinations of men on base: none out, man on first, man on second, man on third, men on first and second, men on first and third, men on second and third, and bases loaded. Eight base-situations times three out-situations gives you 24 states. Here's the Run Matrix for 2008:

Run Matrix - 2008

Runners	Outs
	0	1	2
None on	.521	.279	.108
Man on first	.900	.528	.227
Man on second	1.150	.695	.335
Man on third	1.499	.969	.346
Men on first and second	1.530	.919	.464
Men on first and third	1.769	1.159	.481
Men on second and third	2.006	1.422	.589
Bases loaded	2.306	1.586	.799

It looks more complicated than it is. The figure in the chart for none on and no outs is .521. That simply means that anytime this situation occurred in an inning during 2008, an average of .521 runs were scored after that point. Or, take the bases loaded with one out, the run expectancy is 1.586. Adding up every situation that occurred like that in 2008, we find that 1.586 runs scored on average after a team had the bases loaded and one out.

The key way that we use this chart is to look at it before and after a play. Let's say there's a man on first with one out. The expected runs at that point are .528. The next play is a groundball to the shortstop. He boots it for an error and we now have men on first and second with one out. The expected runs went from .528 to .919. That's an increase of .391 (.919 minus .528) runs. The play itself, the error, cost the team .391 runs. We don't have to follow it through and count the rest of the inning. We know what the value of the ending state is and can use it. The term that we are using in this book for this is Defensive Runs (or Defensive Runs Saved or simply Runs Saved). Since the error cost the team runs, it becomes a negative when stated as Defensive Runs. The value of the error is -.391 defensive runs.

Plus/Minus Runs Saved

The Plus/Minus System is the most important method (or metric) that we use to evaluate defense. By going through each play in our database and using the run matrix table, we have converted plus/minus into plus/minus runs saved. We'll skip the rest of the math, but if you want to know more about it, head over to the last section of this article. When we were all done, we came up with a value of runs saved per plus/minus point by position. Here are the values we use throughout this book:

Plus/Minus Runs per Plus/Minus Point

Pitcher	.75
First Base	.73
Second Base	.76
Third Base	.76
Shortstop	.76
Left Field	.56
Center Field	.56
Right Field	.58

For example, if a pitcher has a +4 plus/minus rating, it translates into three runs saved (.75 x 4). It works similarly for every position. For the corner infielders and the outfielders, we use enhanced plus/minus. These plus/minus run factors are remarkably consistent among the infield positions and separately among the outfield positions.

Runs Saved for Every Metric

Similar to Plus/Minus Runs Saved, we have developed different ways to come up with defensive runs saved for each metric. These are explained throughout the book. For first basemen, for example, we use plus/minus runs saved and bunt runs saved. Bunt runs saved are explained on page 363. Here's a summary by position:

Position	Runs Saved Metric Used
First Basemen	Plus/minus runs saved Bunt runs saved
Second Basemen	Plus/minus runs saved GDP runs saved
Third Basemen	Plus/minus runs saved Bunt runs saved
Shortstops	Plus/minus runs saved GDP runs saved
Outfielders	Plus/minus runs saved Outfielder arm runs saved HR saving runs saved
Catchers	Adjusted earned runs saved Stolen base runs saved
Pitchers	Plus/minus runs saved Stolen base runs saved

Robbing Home Runs

The grand slam of all defensive plays is robbing a home run. You can't make a better play than a reach over the fence to bring back a homer in terms of run value. On average, it saves 1.6 runs. That's the average number of runs that score on home runs after counting up all the runs on solo shots, two-run home runs, three-run dingers and grand slams. Here's the list of the best fence-climbing outfielders over the last three years, based on the database at Baseball Info Solutions:

HR Saving Plays

Torii Hunter	7
Gary Mathews Jr.	5
Corey Patterson	4
Carlos Beltran	3
Andruw Jones	3
Corey Hart	3
Nick Markakis	3
Jermaine Dye	3
Raul Ibanez	3
Jason Bay	3

Defensive Runs Saved by Position

On the next pages, we have defensive runs saved for every regular player over the last three years: for each year and for the three years combined. For position players we show the 35 guys with the most innings in each year, and separately for the three years combined. For pitchers, we use the 175 pitchers with the most innings.

When we finally came up with all the methods to do runs saved and figured them out for every player, the key question was "Do the results make sense?" You can judge for yourself as you look through these ranked lists, but we were very pleased how they came out. We think they provide excellent information to identify the best defensive players in baseball.

Let's go through each position together.

First Base—Albert Pujols has the most runs saved at first base over the last three years. He won The Fielding Bible Award in each of those years, but if I were to vote all over again for 2008, I'd still pick Mark Teixeira. Not only did Teixeira save a couple more runs, he had the most Good Plays (see page 40) in all of baseball. Lyle Overbay and Adrian Gonzalez are a contrast on the three-year chart. Overbay has a ton of trouble with bunts (-7 runs saved) while Gonzalez is the best there is handling bunts (8 runs saved).

Second Base—Chase Utley's incredible 33 runs saved in 2008 launches him to the top of the three-year list. Mark Ellis is second and is tied with Mark Gruzielanek for the most runs saved on double plays over three years with 11. Surprisingly, 2008 Fielding Bible Award winner Brandon Phillips has a low total on double plays (-5).

Third Base—Pedro Feliz is the surprise winner over the last three years, finishing two runs ahead of two-time Fielding Bible Award winner, Adrian Beltre. Feliz won the award in 2007, splitting up Beltre's two awards. Handling bunts is where Feliz passes Beltre. The best players handling bunts are generally National Leaguers—there may be a bias in the data that we should look at in the future.

Shortstop—After being so dominant on defense, Adam Everett is no surprise at the top of the list. Except that he missed huge chunks of playing time over the last two seasons. His one-year total of 34 runs saved in 2006 is higher than the 33 runs saved over three years by second-place finisher, Jimmy Rollins. The best double-play man over the three years is Orlando Cabrera.

Left Field—This one is a complete surprise. Alfonso Soriano has saved an incredible 33 runs for his teams in the last three years with his throwing arm alone. When you have 42 baserunner kills and the next best has less than half (19), that explains it. Take a look at the article about Soriano on page 255. This may be one case where Defensive Runs is indicating the player that saved the most runs but is not indicating the best defensive player at the position. During his first two years in the outfield, opposing runners didn't know better than to try to run on Soriano. He had 34 total kills in 2006 and 2007. But in 2008 they learned something (well, a little), so his still MLB-leading kill total in left field dropped to eight. With two Fielding Bible Awards, Carl Crawford is clearly the best left fielder in baseball.

Center Field—Carlos Beltran also has two Fielding Bible Awards and several Gold Gloves. And he has the most defensive runs saved in center field over the last three years. Andruw Jones remains right up there with Beltran despite his lost season of 2008. The best outfield arm from center field over the three years was Aaron Rowand with 17 runs saved. And the best player at any position pulling back home run balls to his side of the fence was Torii Hunter with 11 runs saved.

Right Field—Alex Rios leads right field by a wide margin with 49 runs saved over three years. He is very consistent with totals of 19 ('06), 16 ('07) and 14 ('08) runs saved in those three years. The best throwing arm is Jeff Francoeur with 25 runs saved, followed closely by Nick Markakis with 21.

Catcher—Jason Kendall has 27 runs saved. Yadier Molina is the runner-up with 19. They did it two different ways. Kendall got most of his runs by calling for the right pitches, helping his battery mates keep down their earned run averages (23 adjusted earned runs saved over the three years). Molina stopped the running game cold with 14 runs saved.

Pitcher—The Gambler, Kenny Rogers, doesn't gamble with grounders. He gobble 'em up better than anyone out there. Well, Greg Maddux might take exception. Rogers had the best total with 27 runs saved. Maddux beat out Kenny with plus/minus runs (25 to 20) but Mad Dog's ineffectiveness with the running game cost him overall. Rogers gained 7 runs with his ability to hold runners while Maddux lost 11. The best pitcher at holding runners in baseball is Mark Buehrle with 12 runs saved.

Wins

To translate runs to wins, there's a great, easy rule of thumb. Each 10 runs is worth a win. Chase Utley has 64 runs saved over the last three years, while Jeff Kent has -41. That's a difference of 105 runs, about 10 wins.

Math for Plus/Minus Runs Saved

Beware! The math is off leash in this section. Here's how we developed the plus/minus runs per plus/minus point chart shown earlier in this article.

Let's start with this example: nobody on and no outs, and the batter hits a hard groundball to Stephen Drew at shortstop, specifically to Vector 197 (slightly to a normal shortstop's right). Before the groundball, the run expectancy was .521 (from the run matrix chart). If Drew gets the out, there is now one out and still nobody on base, a run expectancy of .279, a drop of .242. If he doesn't make the play, the runner reaches first with nobody out, which has a run expectancy of .900, a .379 run increase.

The Plus/Minus System gives us the percentage of the time that a hard groundball to Vector 197 was successfully converted to an out by the shortstop last year: 85.6%. The shortstop will make the play most of the time, but not always. We determine that the average shortstop will contribute  $(.856) \times (.242) + (1 - .856) \times (-.379) = .153$  runs on the play. If Drew converts the out, his play was worth  $.242 - .153 = .091$  runs above the average shortstop.

Obviously, this can get complicated. For outfielders, for instance, a fliner or flyball that falls in safely could easily become a single, double, or triple depending on a number of things, including the runner. Also, baserunners don't always behave predictably. Some take extra bases, some don't. (We take the outfielder's arm into account in the OF Arms section on page 375.) As a result, we average all of these outcomes together based on the frequency of each.

After repeating this procedure for every play, we found that there was still plenty of "noise" in the run values that had nothing to do with the fielder's defensive ability. For example, converting a difficult play with two outs and the bases loaded could be worth two full runs, but the same play with two outs and nobody on was worth a tenth of that, at no fault of the fielder. This is a situational bias that the fielder has little control over. (Unless you want to start arguing about "clutch fielding". We'll save that argument for another time!)

To adjust for this bias, we took a look at how many runs each plus/minus point was worth. How many runs was Chase Utley's +46 plays worth? At second base, it turned out that the average plus/minus point was worth .76 runs. That's 35 plus/minus runs saved for Utley in 2008.
